

The Best Thing I Ever Learned

When you join Scouts, you learn many great things; from knots to first aid, leadership to etiquette, morality to customs. There is a more important skill to learn.

Besides learning survival skills, you also learn how to and are given opportunities to be socialized and interacted with a variety of people, who all share something similar with you – Scouting. In my experience, I have developed such a deep brotherhood and sisterhood with my fellow Scouts. I have known many people from different backgrounds that I will always remember and cherish for the rest of my life. Your relationship with these people will be more precious than anything else, not for now but for future to come. You may run into people you met through Scouts years from now, when the ties have long deteriorated. Because of the inseparable ties that you have developed through Scouts, our relationships have been renewed over and over through Scout lives. How do I know this? This has already happened to me. The relationship that I have built, with people that I otherwise would not have met, is the most important thing I have received from Scouts. These are relationships and memories I will forever cherish.
