

TT9 - The Best Camp !

One of the best camps I'll never forget was TT9. It was a lot better than I expected. Sure, it wasn't as luxurious as TT8, but it was certainly better than most of the camps we go to. I was also surprised it was held in California again. A worldwide scout camp held twice in one state. Although, next TT10 won't be held here, but hopefully, it will be just as fun.

There were lots of fun games. I admit they were better than the games at TT8. I especially liked the tug of war game around the trash bin. That was very fun. Another favorite game of mine was that game where we had to rescue our team in karts while water splashed at us. It kept us cool while we played in the blazing sun. But my favorite was the water gun fight with our whole color team. That was probably the finest game there. And we listened to music while we played. It was convenient because the game took place in such a large field with a giant stereo playing music.

I also liked how they included merit badges to do. That way, you'd not only have fun, but get some work done while doing so. And since the counselors had to do merit badges with each person individually, they pretty much rushed us and that made it so much easier. I got two merit badges done in one day, and boy was it easy.

One thing that I'm sure people can all agree on was the food. It wasn't so good. Sure, they made good food once in a while, but most of it was just distasteful. And of course, most young Asians have adapted to eating non Vietnamese food, which they didn't serve at TT9. I'd have liked it if it was American or something else. This was a worldwide scout camp; they should have served something with more pizzaz.

Another thing I didn't really care for was that there weren't enough seats at the lunch center for everyone, so usually my friends and I had to walk back to our campsite to eat. I didn't really mind that much though. But I did like how the camp was stationed next to a large clear field and a park. It was extremely cold at night, but it was ever so fun staying up with my entire troop and playing games with each other. I didn't even have that many bug bites. This was quite a camp, TT9. I won a boomerang there, and I met many friends there, old and new. This was truly a spectacular event. I look forward to the next TT10.
